Norwegian culture and language as experienced by an American teenager who spends a year in Tromsø, Norway, on an AFS scholarship.

Imagine spending the last year of high school 200 miles north of the Arctic Circle. Not in an igloo or twenty-foot snowdrift, but in the heart of a small Norwegian town where you make life-long friends and fall in love for the first time.

This coming-of-age story, set in the early 1960s, is about an American adolescent becoming a teenage Norwegian. The story is full of midnight sun, mid-winter darkness, and Northern Lights. It is about picking potatoes, walking up and down Main Street, taking ferry rides, and learning to stand cod liver oil. The account of a year-long journey explores the tension between the alienated American youth and the small-town Norwegian teenager inside him. It includes jokes, pranks, silly stories, incomprehensible teachers, and even a high school dancing class.

Surprising, wonderful coming of age story

By J. Bower

This is a fine, moving book masquerading as a strange punch line. While the title sounds like a joke, the book tells the true story of an alienated young American finding himself while a teenage exchange student living 200 miles north of the arctic circle in Norway. Written honestly and with great heart, we have the privilege of watching the small town Norwegians help the author grow up and find himself, love and friendship in the land of the midnight sun.

This book will appeal to many, but not to all. Certainly to those who have traveled far from home to live and make a life in another country. Possibly to young people struggling through their own growing pains who would like to hear inside the thoughts of someone who remembers what it was like to be one of them, and is willing to share the reality. Certainly to anyone who cares to travel inside the head of a perceptive person while they go through a transforming experience.
